JOHN BIGELOW'S MEMOIRS.

RETROSPECTIONS OF AN ACTIVE LIFE. By John Bigelow. Volume IV. (1871-1877). Volume V. (1877-1883). 100 pp. $12.50. Doubleday, Page & Co.

These two volumes complete the reminiscences of the late John Bigelow. His letters, diaries and other literary remains, covering the last thirty-two years of his life, may, so his son and executor informs us in a prefatory note, be utilized in the preparation of future publications. One hopes, indeed, that nothing whatever from the hand of this observant, informing and entertaining diarist will be withheld from the American public.

The preceding four volumes of these "Retrospections" were reviewed at length in these columns at the time of their appearance. What was said of them then applies also to their two successors, which are as full of meat, of American and foreign historical facts and comment, of gossip retailed in the capitals of the Old World and the New, of anecdotes and appreciations of prominent men and women in public life and in literature. The chronicle continues with Mr. Bigelow's departure from Paris at the end of his mission there, and with a detailed account of his hunt for and his discovery of the manuscript of Franklin's autobiography. Among the great political events dealt with are the presidencies of Johnson and Grant, the Mexican venture of Napoleon, the Franco-German war, and the Tilden-Hayes election. There is much shrewd comment on New York State politics at that period, and, incidentally, some inside history of the Centennial at Philadelphia.

Throughout, the anecdotal quality of these reminiscences, the shrewdness of their characterizations of men and events, the cleverness of their pen portraiture promise to give them a prolonged life, and an interest to future historians, if also possible grounds for disagreements. John Bigelow wondered what good Alaska would do the United States after it had been purchased. When he met Grant and discussed with him the Mexican disaster, the future President informed him that Mexico had "made" $2,500,000 in Mexico, and added that he guessed that.

When Bazaine got home to France, it was to find out that he had married a very rich wife, like the officer in the Quartermaster's Department in his earlier days, who was always attributing the apparently incomprehensible physical comforts he enjoyed to the death of his Uncle Sam.

Bigelow's description of Oliver Wendell Holmes's physical appearance, with its reference to the Autocrat's "portulacian-shaped head, strong in the region of self-esteem," is delicious. It did not prevent him from liking the Bostonian heartily. Dickens gave him some entertaining information concerning the famous medium Home. Bulwer had faith in the man, but, according to Dickens, this was simply because Bulwer was deaf and did not like to acknowledge it, wherefore, whenever Home said, "Do you hear those knocks?" Bulwer answered "Yes." Anthony Trollope made an experiment with the impostor that succeeded to perfection. He arranged for a seance on the following evening, and then said to his wife, within Home's hearing, "It was just — years to-night since my dear — was drowned." Dear — had not been drowned at all, but Home produced spiritual evidence that she had been just the same.

Of Napoleon's captivity at Wilhelmshöhe after Sedan, Mr. Bigelow observes that, while it was magnanimous to confine him to a country seat instead of to a fortress, it was also humiliating. He was not guarded, no restrictions were placed on his goings and comings, but there was in all this the unmistakable implication that the defeated Emperor counted no longer for anything at all in the great events that were unfolding. "I doubt if it ever occurred to any of the allied sovereigns, who visited Paris in 1875, to send the uncle to such a place as Wilhelmshöhe." That the Emperor William I was a man of decidedly small intellectual equipment is, of course, perfectly well known. The comic papers of Austria made the most of the fact after the defeat at Sadowa, but never before has it been so bluntly stated as here, in an entry in the diary of a conversation between Mr. Bigelow and Dr. Karl Abel, the master of fifty languages.

He is a very illiterate man, and does not even pretend to know anything about war, but no one is better advised than he about the number of buttons on a soldier's coat and the way he should carry a knapsack. As a measure of his mind and resources he mentioned this fact, which he says deserves to be preserved for history, that King William would like to hear "Pink and Flock." Abel thought that ten times would have driven any other man crazy. What an instance of the goodness of Providence that all this power and worldly distinction should have descended upon a man whom they cannot harm! Most men capable of appreciating the eminence of his position would be flattered by it. He does not comprehend what he has become.

Which is probably an overstatement of the case. Certain it is that William I knew how to select his men and to give them the unflinching support of his authority. There is sly humor in Mr. Bigelow's brief entry of the bit of gossip that ascribed Queen Victoria's veto of Prince Metetrich's appointment as Austrian Ambassador to England to her majesty's fear that the lively princess might have a bad influence on London society. The German Ambassador at the Court of St. James's, Count Münster, told our diarist that Beaconsfield was a "greatly overrated man," who succeeded by flattery and intrigue, and had told the Queen that he read only three books, the Bible, Shakespeare and her majesty's "Life of the Prince Consort." While on the subject of diplomacy, it should be added that the curious will find here several references to the perplexities created by the visit of Grant to the European capitals on his tour of the world. Having, as ex-President, no official status in his own country, the question of precedence at official functions greatly bothered both our ministers abroad and the court chamberlains.

Mr. Bigelow devotes some pages to that now practically forgotten "Mrs. Leo Hunter," the late Mrs. Holt, who in her day—it is not so very long ago—prettied over one of the few really agreeable, interesting, and therefore successful, salons New York has ever had. Another of the "good things" upon which one constantly happens in these pages must be quoted. Writing to Mr. Bigelow from Albany in 1877, Daniel Manning said: "A gentleman from New York tells me he knows that Dorsheimer is a disappointment down there. I suppose they have discovered that he cannot deliver according to the promise of his physique." Remembering the flight of time, one hastens to inform a younger generation that the late William Dorsheimer, Lieutenant Governor of the state under Tilden, was a man of enormous height and girth, and well pleased with himself.

Therefore one revives, without apology, one of the best things the late William Travers ever said. Travers, driving a buggy, encountered Dorsheimer about "Get in," said Travers, drawing up. "I am too big," answered Dorsheimer. "G-g-get in," repeated the famous stuttering wit; "b-b-b-perhaps you are not so big as you think you are."

One more quotation. Among his innumerable acquaintances Mr. Bigelow counted a young German diplomatist, who, in accordance with the fashion of the day, kept an album of "sentiments," to which celebrities of many nations had contributed. He was proud of the three entries that follow:

My long life has taught me two bits of wisdom, which I have often been forced to carry into practice. One is to forgive much; the other, never to forget.

Paris, March 21, 1870. GUZOT.

A little forgetfulness mars neither the sincerity nor the dignity of forgiveness.

Paris, April 6, 1870. THIERS.

My life has taught me that I have much to forget, and much to be forgiven for.

Bismarck.

Berlin, November 17, 1871.

In this review of these two volumes their anecdotal side has been kept in the foreground. Their serious phase was briefly referred to at the beginning of this article. Nothing remains to be added, except the repetition of a desire for the early publication of whatever remains of Mr. Bigelow's diaries and correspondence.

HARDY ADVENTURES

Crude Life Observed in Various Parts of the World.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A TENDER-FOOT. Being a true and unvarnished account of his world wanderings. By Ralph Stock. With illustrations reproduced from photographs by the author. 8vo. pp. 200. Henry Holt & Co.

Books have to be written all the while for travel readers. There is a well defined type of man, we are informed upon good authority, that of a bookseller of thirty years' standing, who cares little for any other sort of reading. One of the class composed of these solid minded gentlemen can be recognized, to quote our friend again, across the street; just as, no says, with one eye shut he can "tell" a reader of Dr. van Dyke. This before us is not a "literary" book. "So far, so good," say sensible travel readers. The author is advertised as a man of education and refinement, has done work as a journalist, and writes a perfectly clear, easy style. His work will not, however, appeal to the subtle mind as successfully vivacious, although he has struggled valiantly to make it so. But as a "true and unvarnished account of world wanderings," of experiences in crude and hardy living in the Canadian Northwest and the lumber camps of the Western United States; of adventures and observations in the South Sea Islands, and of farming experiments in Australia, it is satisfactorily vivid.

The author is an Englishman and wrote his book originally for an English, indeed a London, audience, which obviously he expects to regard the revelation of his explorations of such foreign parts as North America as marvellous, indeed. He translates for its benefit the weird terms employed in this division of the world; for instance, "hobo—i. e., a tramp." And the term "box car" he captures in his net for English inspection, though he endeavors never to appear surprised at anything he encounters. "It never does," he says, "to show surprise at anything in the West." "The Western mind," he observes further, "is dense on occasion." At one place in his book he comes near to wit: a muscular giant of a Russian whom he employed on his fruit farm in Queensland, "yet was as gentle as a woman—should be."

A very interesting portion of this book is that discussing the danger of loneliness and the deterioration of self-respect in solitude. The author went camp herding by himself. For the first week he regarded the situation as one of "absolute peace." He continues:

"The second week was precisely like the first, except that when meal times came around I asked myself what was the use of lighting the fire, and answered the question by sitting down to eat. I would have been alive equally well without the mutton and tea. The third week was marked by the first intuition that I was acquiring new habits, for one evening I suddenly realized that I was talking to myself in quite a loud voice. Just about this time I also forgot to brush my hair, and even on occasions to wash. At the end of a month I received the first intuition that I was acquiring new habits, for one evening I suddenly realized that I was talking to myself in quite a loud voice. Just about this time I also forgot to brush my hair, and even on occasions to wash.
